

in defense of becoming and remaining a human

i am in favor of lowering the standards without losing the right to be trusted.

the most things that work the most often are the ones you must work with...

the things that most often do not work often

become the long time between miracles and miracles are seldom a disciplined plan.

this is not a shallow or easy philosophy for any standards administrator.

you have to let the extenuatings from the wrong side of the track marry the equivalents.

however there is an advantage.

you do not have to hear the hoof beats

of the moral posse

and the four horsemen

on patrol day and night.

becoming and remaining a human.
